

Ron Josias – Our first awardee to graduate college (last year), recently got a job as an engineer with a major government contractor located at the Atlantic City International Airport. It brings back fond memories to me, since I visited the FAA research facility at that airport (it was called Bader Field back then) in the 60's and 70's.

Andrew McGibbon, our second college graduate, is taking a year "off" to work on a visual educational project involving the Holocaust. Then he will begin a 4-year program at Princeton Theological Seminary leading to Masters Degrees in Divinity and Social Work. How fitting for Andrew, who has always focused on serving God by serving humanity!

Dolani Ajanaku is on track to graduate from Rutgers next year with a major in Biological Sciences. Dolani is in the process of applying to medical schools, and her dedication was demonstrated by her declining to join us for lunch after Class Day so that she could study for her MCATs.

Dahanah Josias Sejour will graduate from William and Mary next year and is majoring in Psychology. She could not join us at Class Day at all, since she is back at William & Mary for the summer working on a research project.

Cassandre Louis will be a junior next year at Geneseo, majoring in Biology. In addition to her academic success, Cassandre participates extensively in student life at Geneseo.

Monishka Pierre is at Rutgers, also a rising junior, and has not yet declared a major. However, like many of our recent scholarship winners, she is planning on a career in the medical field.

Na'imah Spells will be going into her sophomore year at Centenary, majoring in Social Work. She also excels in dance and music and is a member of the volleyball team.

Carolyn Roberts will have enough credits to graduate from Rutgers next year, after taking a year off (2011-12) for personal reasons. She is a journalism major, and has made a strong comeback by achieving excellent grades last semester.
